[2] Photo of the fishwife Mary Matthews and William Downing peeping out of his doorway (on the right) at Fradgan Place with the punt of the fishing boat Jenny Lind. Frith Photograph. The fishwives once dressed in black with white aprons, red shawls around their shoulders and black hats like Mary Kelynack had worn. By 1900, when Mary Mathews was photographed this dress had changed. The red shawl had been replaced, but the fishwives still carried cowals, which were baskets that carried some 300 pilchards. The cawal was held by a belt made of webbing that was wound around the hat. The women's backs were protected by the 'turnover', a woollen shawl folded corner-wise, with the point at the back caught down securely to a white apron worn over a full skirt. To ease the burden further, a pad stuffed with horsehair was tied under the skirt at waist level. Pat Pilkerton Collection. She used to buy the fish and find it too heavy to lift the strap onto her head. So she would call to any young men around, 'Come on my sons, Up wed-en' - so that is how she got her nickname. (Williams, 1988:62). |
| 1851 | 711 | <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> | Photo of fishwife Mary Trezise Kelynack (born 1776). She was a 'back jouser' or fish hawker who walked 340 miles to London to see the Great Exhibition of 1851, a journey that took five weeks. She met Queen Victoria, and presented her with a pound of tea as a present. The Queen recorded the meeting in her diary. Most of the newspapers put her age (incorrectly) at eighty-four! She was a familiar sight in the traditional dress of the fishwife, scarlet jacket, dark blue serge skirt, white apron, and a large hat. She carried her fish for sale in a cawal, a basket which rested on her back, with a broad strap going over the top of the head. |
